Sperm motility is a key step in the process of fertilization, which can be affected by various factors such as hormones and temperature (overall, the more motile spermatozoa are able to migrate toward the site of fertilization, that is, the female genital tract) \[[@CR44]\]. At the beginning of our studies, we observed that sperm motility after artificial fertilization was induced by the hormone 17 $\beta$ -oestradiol (E2), which is the most relevant to fish reproduction \[[@CR15]\]. However, we did not observe any effect of HPX treatment on sperm motility after artificial insemination in sea bass. In fact, we observed a significant increase in sperm motility after HPX treatment before fertilization in both sea bass and \*Squalius alburnoides\*. Our data suggest that HPX is not directly involved in sperm motility but may indirectly regulate it via other processes. A non-enzymatic mechanism in sea bass has been described for the interaction of E2 with insulin-like growth factor binding proteins (IGFBP-3), which is an important regulator of fertilization in fish \[[@CR45]\]. After that we studied whether HPX affects sperm physiology, we analyzed glucose consumption by spermatozoa after HPX exposure. The glucose content in mammalian spermatozoa is relatively low compared to other cells \[[@CR46]\], but increases when activated at the time of fertilization \[[@CR47]\]. Studies performed in our lab also suggest that SAG acts like a glucose transporter in sea bass spermatozoa, although at least the activity of the aquaglyceroporin 1 (AQP1) is more relevant to the transportation of glucose and glycerol than SAG \[[@CR48]\]. We observed that HPX induces the expression of glucose uptake in sea bass spermatozoa, and interestingly that the expression of AQP1 decreases. In fact, we observed a significant increase in glucose consumption by sea bass spermatozo
